The granite frameway.

It must have been quite a major task building all those rails?

Well yes, and of course they had to negotiate the turns off from the main route and just that short distance over there there's this rather fine point work, just like a set of points where the rail verges off to one side and there's a little hole there where some device was inserted which would help to guide the wheels to the required direction, and of course the men would be leading the horses and they would also assist by guiding the horse in the right direction.
