Building the Information Centre.

Initially it was a carpenter's workshop, so I looked at the carpenter's shop with a possibility of using it to find that the frontage had bowed right out, because it was lots of windows with glass in, so I was able to rescue the building quickly and pull it back with steel tie rods, and then from there on, eventually, it was developed and we built toilets on the side because they were urgently needed out here, the block that was in the side of the car park was totally out of date. We then built the big interpretation centre, gradually developed that, downstairs then upstairs, so it gradually evolved, because it was such a honey pot for people that came and wanted to park to come and see the bridge, but also to take off on the various footpaths that go up beside the Dart.
