

Pauline Ward and Harry Warne

Bill Gough, the train driver.

Pauline: It was just one carriage, wasn't it? And an engine, and if you had this particular driver called Gough he was a real, he used to give you a ride for your money and of course it was all twists and bends and a little carriage going around these bends and it was an experience to be experienced wasn't it really?

Harry: I think one of the funniest things about the railway, coming up one night apparently, well they'd very often run out of steam, you know, they had to stop and get some more steam up, they hadn't put enough coal on or something, saving coal! And one night Goughy the driver, lost his false teeth, he had to stop the train and look for his false teeth!

Pauline: It's true, he was hanging out the carriage or something, and of course you used to be able to look out the window and the driver or the fireman would be looking out at the engine and you could talk to him you see, especially if you're going around the bend you could see their engine and your carriage was around here somewhere.
